The reason your not getting the correct match is because you are using the regex to match just the first string in the file, then you are re-using the regex for the second string and on. So you are not ever getting a match for the first string at all.Q: Java Iterator.remove() returns false even though element is there I have an element in an Iterator which is supposed to be there based on my condition but it is not. It still returns false though. I have tried get().next() to get the first element (which is there) and it returns true. I have also tried to get the first element, use it, and remove it before iterating again but that also returns false. Any help would be appreciated. Thanks. A: get() will retrieve the current element. Since there is an even number of elements, it will return the first one. If the iterator is empty, the current element will be the first one, too. If there are two or more elements, and you call next(), you'll get the second one. It returns false if there are no elements. You can see it in the source code, it calls hasNext() and if there are no elements, hasNext() returns false: public boolean hasNext() { return cursor!= size(); } a rival carrier.
